Buddies

A brief magazine, so a brief editorial.

Well OK, I have to give thanks to all the contributors who gave me some copy for this months magazine.

Don't forget it is your magazine - if you want to advertise trips, tell us what a wonderful time you had on your holiday, say thankyou to the instructors who trained you, tell us about your first dive etc etc then THIS is the place to do it!

Without your input the magazine will be a boring place and I'll have to tell you more about the animals down on Phil Litchfield's farm!

So lets have some articles, doesn't have to be extensive, doesn't have to have pictures, just tell us how you are getting on and enjoying our hobby!

Did anyone spot my 'deliberate' mistake last month? - putting the training programme in twice!

(And still there have been no letters)

Trip to Bovi

The weather was absolutely gorgeous for the weekend, diving conditions we couldn't really ask for better, as it was sunny but not hot, and the sea was very calm, The Saturday we got the majority of the diving done. We had 17 people in attendance to the trip and over the weekend we managed a total of 69 dives. One of the ocean divers who had never dived other than in a pool managed to complete his ocean diver and get signed off. A massive thanks to Fran for organising the trip and ensuring it ran smoothly.

Farming Corner

Reported in last month's Freeflow was the new arrival at the Litchfield Estate - one little lamb! Well the score now is 6 little lambs - which this intrepid reporter has actually seen. This doubles the size of the flock! Rumours about incestuous relationships and sweet little lambs 'going for meat' may have some truth in them. It all happens down on the farm!

Keeping Hydrated

Now we should all know how important it is keeping hydrated when we go diving and not only should you keep hydrated, but you should ideally keep the salt levels up as well. Some companies make special preparations to do this - and this is one supermarket offering:

Hmm so that would be a drink then!

Real Ingredients

Keeping on the theme of packaging... seen on the bag of a packet of crisps by a well know local crisp manufacturer

The other option... imaginary ingredients!

New Trailer for Skinny

Nigel has been busy this month - what with taking Chilly back to the suppliers, going diving, he has also found time to acquire a new trailer for Skinny... AND swap the boat over. And this is how he did it:

Off the old trailer

Onto the new one

Loaded ready for the road

Adjusted

So now we have a shiny new trailer for Skinny as well as a Shiny new Boat and Trailer in Chilly

What's the plans for next month Nigel?
(Wouldn't want you to get bored!)

But isn't the drawbar a bit long?

FUTURE TRIPS

RED SEA May 2010

Mike Flatt is planning to run a Red Sea Trip in May 2010 - more in his own words:

I am looking at two possible dates , Saturday May 01st-08th and Sat May 30th-June 06th.

The first week is the may day bank holiday but only the monday is a school holiday.

The second is the Bank holiday and School half term week.

The reason I have put both dates is the price difference, as with all school holidays the cost is more. I have spoken with Tony Backhurst Scuba and have some estimate prices. They will not give a fixed price at this time due to various reasons" to many to list" but the usual fuel, Exchange rate are top of the list. I f we confirm a booking they will confirm the price.

Week one doing the Northern Wrecks & Reef's is £800. The second week is £975 for the same trip. This is apparently due mainly to the flight surcharge for school holidays.

I f anyone interested can let me know there preference of date etc I t will help me try to sort out a trip plan and see which date people want.

To get the best deal we need to fill the boat (20 places).

The requirement is Sports Diver + 30 dives.

Ocean Divers will have 12 months to get up to this level, although less qualified divers can be taken with Tony Backhurst's permission but will not be able to do all the dives.

Non divers can go and may get a small reduction in price again this will depend on how many non divers.

Included in the price are return flights to Sharm, Transfers to the boat, Full board on the boat inc dive weights and cylinder, Hotel on the last night and transfer to airport.

You can log on to www.scuba.co.uk and look at either Typhoon or Whirlwind to see the Quality of boat and fittings.

As a club we have done this trip many times and it is a fantastic trip, I know that some company's are cheaper and offer the same but when you see the Tornado Marine boats they are miles ahead in terms of spec & comfort.

I f you want anymore info please call or e-mail me

Cheers

Mike

MALTA October 2009

Time Deacon (Bash) is Planning a trip to Malta - again more in his own words:

Is anyone interested in a long weekend diving in Malta beginning of October.

I have dived there the last 2 years about this time. The water temp is about 24C the air about the same. Visibility (underwater) is about 10-20m . There is plenty of wrecks and caves, but not that many fish (did see a big school of Barracuda though). Most of the diving is shore based just turn up and jump in; it's not that busy at that time of year. If I get enough interest I could look at hiring a boat to do some deeper stuff 40m +.

The dive operator I use is Subway Scuba [subwayscuba.com] 5 tanks and weights for £35 [or we can have guided diving for £30/dive] you need to be sports diver or PADI AOW to dive independently unless we have an instructor with us [see website].

Below is a basic itinerary costing for trip priced on 28/5/09 flights and accommodation may alter the longer we leave it. I would need the flight and hotel money up front.

Itinerary:-

Flight Ryanair Luton Thursday 16-40 1/10. Returning Sunday 21-25 4/1 Luggage allowance 15kg (hold) 10kg (hand) you can book extra if you need it!

Hotel Topaz in Buggibba 3-4* self catering
Diving 5 tanks and weights
Car hire

Approx. costings based on 2 sharing

Flight	£125
Hotel	£ 21
Diving	£ 35
Car hire	£ 25

Total £206

Extras airport parking approx £30/car

Beer and food Malta is quite reasonable depending on the Euro

If anyone is interested or wants more details please let me know

DO's bit

After the last couple of years finally we seem to have some decent weather. There is nothing like a few good weekends to get us all back into diving mode and to renew our enthusiasm. There have already been several trips and Scapa approaches, with a Weymouth RIB trip over the last weekend of Scapa. Sadly, Mike's Farnes trip had to be cancelled due to bad weather, but there really is no point in driving more than 250 miles to stand on the harbour wall.

On the subject of RIB's. Skinny Dip now has a new trailer, which is a much better trailer than the original. With multiple rollers it runs so easily that you can move it by hand on the rollers.

Make sure it is well secured for the road!

We have now dispensed with the old 'over the boat' straps in favour of one short one at the bow and two from the hooks at the stern. They are much more secure and will not affect the warrantee on Chilly Dip, which could be void, if we strap over the tubes.

Chilly Dip. I'm sure that every one knows that we have had a problem with the new boat.

Lucky Dip gave us excellent service for 9 years, but we always acknowledged that the engine was just that little bit too small and did sometimes struggle to get up on the plane with a full load.

The solution was to have a slightly larger unit.

We in fact went for a 40% larger engine.

With a boat of the same size you would think that the additional power would make life much easier and although we knew that it would use a little more fuel, we thought that we would be able to throttle back as soon as the boat was planing and provided you did not want to go racing, the net result may even be a saving of fuel.

Not so.

The boat in fact struggles to plane, and in choppy water as soon as you drop off the plane you need to work very hard including shifting the load forward to get back on the plane.

What we are certain of is that this is not a fundamental problem, but a matter of set-up only. i.e. height of engine, angle of trim, prop size or pitch, etc. The boat is currently back at Ribcraft's works for them to check over and take to the coast for trials. They will contact me in the next couple of days with (hopefully) the solution. They have undertaken to sort it out and do what ever is required to give us the boat that we ordered. That is, a boat that will take 6 divers with kit and comfortably maintain planing speed in reasonable conditions.

What amazes and irritates me is that Ribcraft who are acknowledged to be one of the best, if not the best RIB builder in the UK, cannot take a tried and tested engine and pair it with their own boat with complete success every time.

Although every boat is slightly different and we did in fact make some alterations to the standard unit, including moving the console forward (this should in fact make things better as far as getting the boat on the plane is concerned) their experience should include every conceivable combination.

We will however succeed, and hopefully by the time of the Weymouth trip in a week and a half all will be well.

At least Ribcraft are better than Humber who could not even tell us how much the boat would weigh within 100 kg!

A couple of reminders, please use full SMB's anywhere near any surface activity.

Check that you have no sharp bits on your pony brackets, I have just cut the end of my jubilee clip off.

A good season's diving to all.

Nigel

BILL & MEGGIE JOHNSON - Sneaky Farnes Dip 23/24 May.

I'm not a regular contributor, mainly because I can't see how anyone could possibly be interested in my diving exploits; heaven knows you've all got plenty of your own going on. But our esteemed Editor is complaining loudly about a lack of waffle to fill the pages of this month's edition, so I'll have a go. There are no references to sex, violence or drugs in what follows, so please feel free to skip straight on to the next article if you prefer.

As Treasurer, one Club tripsheet after another has come into my hands this year, and each fresh one brings a new disappointment that I can't make it because of other commitments. It's just one of those things - rather like No 27 buses, or policemen? - something along those lines anyway. Added to this, my daughter Meg, mystery club member whom hardly any of you have yet met because she lives and works in Guildford as a Sports Therapist, can only manage certain weekends to go diving.

The upshot of all this is that much of my 'trip' diving this year is arranged with Meg as my buddy. So when the dates for Mike Flatt's trip to the Farnes didn't fit my diary yet again, I ended up arranging one for Meg and myself to visit the seals last weekend, 23 May, instead. Mike: I'm sure you won't think I'm gloating when I tell you that the weather was Perfect (with a capital P) and that the diving, despite raised eyebrows when I mentioned to some that we were going out with Sovereign, was very nicely along the same lines.

We drove up on the Friday night and camped at the Budle Bay campsite; a bit rough and ready but a very warm and helpful welcome for two latecomers in the dark (bank holiday traffic had been terrible) and very cheap, so worth remembering for you cash-strapped budget divers. Saturday morning, only 10 minutes' drive away, dead easy, good value parking was available as usual on the quayside - £4 for the day - and Sovereign II was smack on time. The boat was packed with divers because several had dropped out last-minute, resulting in everyone from both the Sovereign boats being put onto the one. This led to plenty of chat and people getting to know one another, even if a little crowded.

A very light wind gave us a fluffy surface and an easy ride out to the Callars (I think? Farnes veterans please correct me) where we dived the wreck of the Britannia <http://www.divemagazine.co.uk/news/article.asp?UAN=2071&v=5&sp>. No Seal - Big Eel. A huge fella lurking in one of the Britannia's boilers (which is pretty much all that's left of the old steamer for the casual diver to see) who was not best pleased with my LED torch in his eyes. Meg, on her first 'proper' sea dive, was thrilled with the profusion of Dead Mens' Finger, Urchins and the other typical fauna that is the hallmark of that area. Her weighting and buoyancy control were both bang on the money. As a PADI OW > Ocean crossover, she's still fairly new in a drysuit so was a little apprehensive - so that was another good step forward. During sandwiches (ours) and tea / coffee (theirs) we had trundled over to the Blue Caps where there were plenty of seals lazing around. We dived the wall, through one of the guts, and into several of the gaps, crevasses and gullies in search of playmates for Meg. All right, I admit it - for me too. We did come across one very large grey gentleman, but we surprised him and he shot off before we'd had a good look. It was bit chilly and grey on the way back and the sea had fetched up to a good lumpy roll, so one lady on board looked decidedly miserable and a fetching shade of greyish green. Luckily, though, we didn't witness the contents of her sandwiches.

And that should have been that as far as Sovereign were concerned. But as we arrived back at the quayside, the skipper asked if we'd like a second day with them because even more divers had dropped out of the Sunday. We were due to do a couple of Meg's Sports dives off St Abbs harbour wall, so it was no contest really. With the change of plan, we grabbed a (newly vacant) twin room at Sovereign's excellent B&B. For twenty five quid a head you get a warm, comfortable room with a welcome to match, the use of a large garage to hang and store your kit, and best of all a hearty Full English Breakfast that is timed (get this!) in accordance with Ropes Off. You just couldn't wish for better now, could you?

Sunday brought bright, warm sunshine, an almost glassy sea, and a spacious total of only eight divers on the boat, all of whom had been at the B&B, so everyone now knew each other which makes for a fun day's diving. We did Longstone End in the morning, with reported sightings of huge lobsters in the deep cracks, now increasingly prevalent since the area has become designated 'No Take' for divers. Poor old Dave Wilson. He'll just have to stick to West Bay. Meg and I incurred the wrath of a crab big enough for a tasty lunchtime sandwich - such a shame. A leisurely, crab-free lunch interval took us out to The Hopper which was truly alive with seals - and this time we weren't disappointed. We bounced down to 20 and immediately started our ascent via the steep walls with their deep gullies and the big swim-through. As we approached it, a dark flash shot underneath us on the sea bed - and suddenly there it was. An almost black juvenile investigating the pair of us with another pair of divers nearby, camera at the ready. The inquisitive visitor decided that Meg's fins were far too yellow and might eat him, but my dark blue ones were far less threatening. So there was Meg, nearly spitting out her reg with excitement as the seal nibbled away at my proffered fins with pearly white teeth until he got bored and swam away. Then, within a minute, another, greyer seal appeared, hovering just an arm's length away from Meg's face trying to work out whether she was friend or foe, before disappearing into the gloom.

Viz was only 6 or 7 metres so the camera shot wasn't good quality (it was a compact) , but these encounters were enough to convert a Thailand trained PADI diver to British diving, good and proper. Another tick in the box I think. And who cares about Meg's Sports dives - she'll get them signed off anyway at her Army club in Aldershot in plenty of time for our impending Red Sea trip. As someone once said to me, "You mustn't let qualifications get in the way of a good dive".

I'm sure BSAC wouldn't publish anything as irresponsible as that, but you get my drift.

Bill J.
